

INSIDE OUT 2018

Inside Out

JeffArts Literary/Arts Journal
Spring 2018

Chief Editors: Anitha Ahmed and Anya Platt Artistic Director: Kevin Tang Literary Director: Madeleine Norris

Editors:

Benjamin Barnhart
Jarett Beaudoin
Jane Beriont
Timothy Chou
Caroline Christianson
Jessica Clark
Michelle D'Souza
Daniela Fishbein
Harnoor Kaur
Karishma Kodia
Christopher Kustera
Jeffrey Lee

Alisha Maity
Sh'Rae Marshall
Luis A. Aguilar Montalvan
Leena Ramani
Benjamin Richter
Maddy Russell
Hanna Sandhu
Mak Sarich
Kathryn Sommers
Megumi Tsuda
Amber Zhang
Richard Zhang

The Jefferson Arts Organization was founded primarily to offer Thomas Jefferson University students the opportunity to express themselves through art. The Jefferson Arts organization focuses on such media as art and photography, writing, and music and supports diverse activities including live readings, art exhibits and musical performances. In addition, the organization publishes Inside Out annual art and literary journal which showcases photography, paintings, sketches, short stories, poems and essays contributed by university students. All of these activities are designed to bring more diversity to the Jefferson community; to allow students, faculty and staff the chance to stop and reflect on their daily lives; and to provide a creative outlet from the rigors of school and work.

Content Warning: This magazine includes some written pieces with mature language and potentially triggering subject matter.

Foreword

Welcome to the 2018 issue of Inside Out!

Inside Out is the literary and arts journal of the Jefferson student body. As such, it gives voice to our scholars as they migrate through their educational experience at our University. The creativity and vision of our students is featured within the pages of this book. Showcased is student work that was created in the intervals between classes and notebooks, dorm rooms and city streets.

Please enjoy this issue of Inside Out, as our students offer a unique view of their world using images, colors, words and light.

Charles A. Pohl, MD

Vice Provost for Student Affairs, Thomas Jefferson University

Vice Dean for Student Affairs and Professor of Pediatrics, Sidney Kimmel Medical College

Editors' Statement

We are delighted to present Inside Out, 2018: a raw commentary on physiologic, psychologic, and social health. In this production are expressions of awe, anger, anxiety, and grief; here you'll find colorful intersections of satire and introspection, blacks and grays highlighted with wildly vibrant texture and mood. The artists featured in our compilation approach complicated questions such as –

How does one process illness—morbidity and mortality—in themselves, their patients, and their loved ones?
How does one explore one's identity in the context of societal stigmas and expectations?
How does one manage the sudden and sometimes overwhelming responsibilities of caretaking, in all of its forms?

These pieces range from meditative to whimsical to provocative; they invite the audience to feel, speculate, and understand—to accept the abstract, and think carefully about the gaps between factual and emotional truth. We hope you enjoy the craftsmanship and critical thought of Thomas Jefferson University's student body!

Anitha Ahmed & Anya Platt Editors in Chief

Kevin Tang
Artistic Director

Madeleine Norris
Literary Director

Submission Information

Inside Out is a presentation of artwork, photography, short stories, poems and essays that is published annually. All full-time and part-time Jefferson students are welcome to submit work and to apply to serve on the magazine's editorial board. Submissions may be emailed to Dorissa.Bolinski@jefferson.edu. Photographic submissions should be saved as a .jpeg file using the highest resolution possible. Artwork should be photographed from a direct angle, without glare or visible background, and saved in the same manner as photographs. Artists who submit non-photographic material will be given the opportunity to have their accepted pieces professionally photographed by a Jefferson photographer in order to assure the best presentation in the printed magazine.

All submissions will be reviewed anonymously; not all submissions will be printed. Please note that entries will be judged as submitted; Inside Out will not crop, sharpen or otherwise adjust an improperly-saved graphic submission.

Manuscripts (prose, poetry, translations, short plays, etc.) should be submitted in a Word-compatible document, and saved under the name of the piece (or "untitled," if applicable).

All submissions must be accompanied by a separate cover letter document containing the following:

- Author's or artist's name
- Email address and local phone number
- College, department or undergraduate program and year in school
- Genre/medium and title of each submission

Inside Out does not publish anonymous submissions or previously published works. Further submission inquiries may be addressed to dorissa.bolinski@jefferson.edu.

View the online version of Inside Out at:
jefferson.edu/university/campus-life/inside-out.html

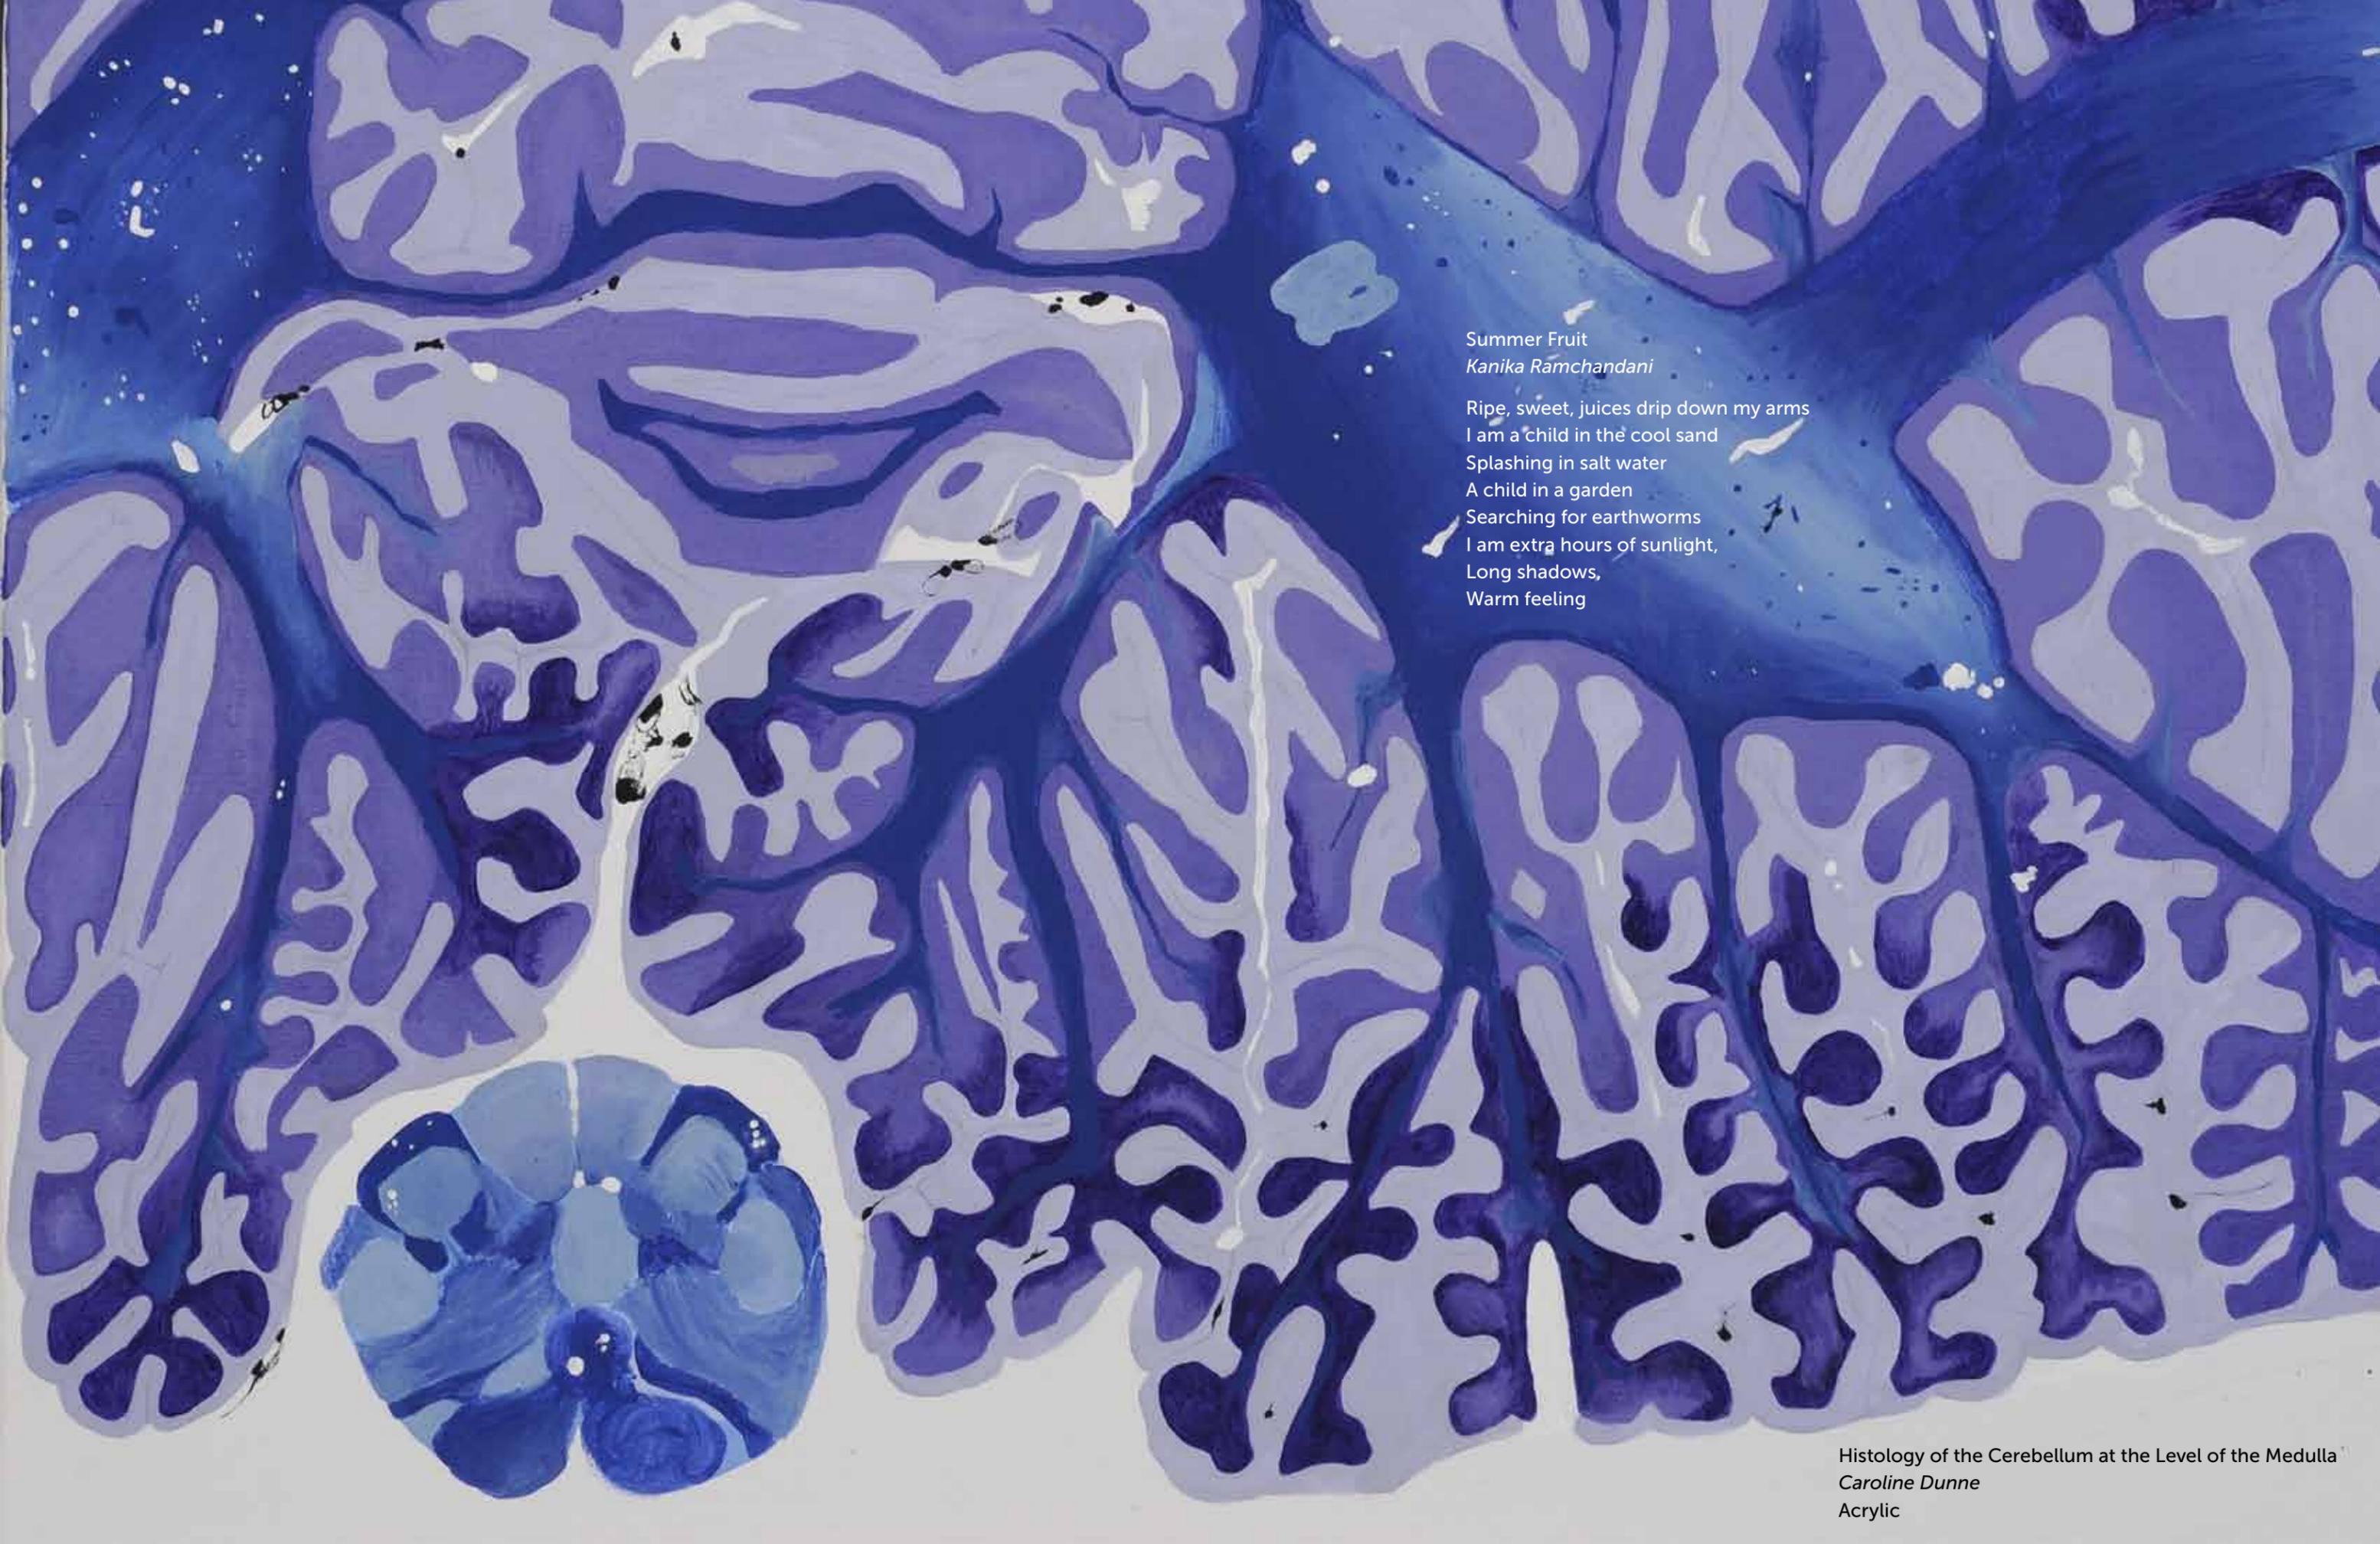

Contents

Untitled Jane Jacob	Cover	Newborn Exam Jordyn Tumas	9	Gavel Anya Platt	16	Cherry Chiffon Cage Daisy Zhang	28
Guy Tariro Mupaso	Inside Cover	The Descent Jeffrey Lee	9	City Hall My Duyen Nguyen	16	Jewel Chen Zhou	29
IM Rounds Michelle Chen	1	Daydreams Kevin Tang	10	Specimen for Frozen Section Michelle Chen	17	Country Roads Sh'Rae Marshall	30
Histology of the Cerebellum at the Level of the Medulla Caroline Dunne	3	Snapple Facts Madeleine Norris	10	Untitled Anya Platt	17	Industry January Delaware River North Philadelphia Holly A. Rankin	31
Summer Fruit Kanika Ramchandran	2	Glitter Rachel Werk	11	Metal Fiend Tariro Mupaso	18	Alleyway Samantha Nguyen	33
Serenity Chen Zhou	4	The Twelve Apostles Kevin Tang	11	Birthing Hands Samantha Schoer	19	Innocence Daisy Zhang	33
Stage IV Jordyn Tumas	5	Fog January Delaware River North Philadelphia Holly A. Rankin	12	Tree Katie Sommers	20	Broken Sh'Rae Marshall	34
Pitting Anitha Ahmed	6	Plain Anya Platt	12	Ground Glass Samantha Schoer	20	Contemplation Jeffrey Lee	34
The Other Hand Sophia Dang	6	home Anthony Vu	13	whistle Harnoor Kaur	21	Figure Study Chen Zhou	36
Dust Victoria Stevenson	7	Still Life Samantha Nguyen	13	Zeke Samantha Nguyen	21	My Adela Shayan Waseh	37
Conflagration Anitha Ahmed	8	I'm Sorry Yashmi Mahat	14	Study for a Graphic Novel Naomi Newman	22	A Question of Death Malika Madhava	38
Sweet Shop - Tangail, Bangladesh Micaela Langille Collins	8	Elodie Madeleine Norris	14	Women's Month Samantha Schoer	23	Eye Contact Rachel Werk	39
				Lessons for My Daughter Madeleine Norris	24	Food Water Shelter Zachary Howell	40
				Folklore Jarred Holt	25	The Last Kiss Jeffrey Lee	40
				I am art Sh'Rae Marshall	26	sunsets from antelope island Karishma Kodia	41
				Lungs Alex Siegelman	26

A Night at Penn's Landing Xiang Zhang	41	Winter Farmscape Samantha Nguyen	48
The Spade Mak Sarich	42	I returned to that bench Bryce Eng	49
Queen's View, Scotland Katie Sommers	42	Untitled Kanika Ramchandani	49
Portrait Study Chen Zhou	43	Untitled Jane Jacob	50
The Scars I'm Too Afraid To Get B. Samuel Meyers	43	alternate names for curiosity Sh'Rae Marshall	50
Vegas Remembered Bryce Eng	44	Gold Brain Slice Leena Ramani	51
Best Friends Jeffrey Lee	45	Red Mak Sarich	51
Abstract Anatomy Introspection Jordyn Tumas	45	A fragment of thought Malika Madhava	51
i'm sorry Harnoor Kaur	45	Cat Fight Leena Ramani	52
Autopsy Laura Simpler	46	Almost Tariro Mupaso	54
Anatomy Spine Leena Ramani	47	Untitled Katherine Cambareri	56
Her Grief Changes Lily Black	48

IM Rounds
Michelle Chen
Watercolor and Ink

Summer Fruit
Kanika Ramchandani

Ripe, sweet, juices drip down my arms
I am a child in the cool sand Splashing in salt water
A child in a garden Searching for earthworms
I am extra hours of sunlight, Long shadows,
Warm feeling

Histology of the Cerebellum at the Level of the Medulla Caroline Dunne
Acrylic

Stage IV

Jordyn Tumas

"White Wisp" is the color of hospital floors. It is the hospital curtains, the hospital gowns, and the hospital walls. It blends everything together without beginning or end. "White Wisp" lightly settles on my patient's emaciated figure, all the life seemingly drained from her, a reflection of the arduous journey she has been allotted. It wakes her up in the middle of the day and gently lulls her back to sleep moments later. "White Wisp" is a long corridor that appears exactly like all the others, leading her towards a CT scan of her brain, a scan looking for metastasis of the ovarian cancer, a scan which her doctors didn't explain to her before she was wheeled out of her room. "White Wisp" is sewn into the fibers of every white coat that listens to her heart and lungs while the true illness shouts from her pelvis—it clings to the cheerful smiles that exchange pleasantries, which last only until they leave to check in on the next room.

"White Wisp" lives in the sclera of her husband and sister's eyes, every morning betraying the fear behind their brave words. It shrouds us in our final hug, though leaving only compassion in its wake.

"White Wisp" is a diagnosis with no cure.
It is a promise you want to make but know you cannot keep...
And yet, "White Wisp" is still hope.

Opposite page:
Serenity
Chen Zhou
Oil

Pitting

Anitha Ahmed

cardiology floor, jefferson hospital the skin of your dry shin scales, breaks to touch and oozes.

you cough and pull the yellow phlegm with fingers off your tongue

—as if, from my gut—I jerk away;
our guilty eyes meet.
then, I press

my finger pads to your bone and leave my mark, a crater

a full white moon dead skin and serum on my hand

three full seconds to fill the pit fluid has a funny memory—it spills under the skin and holds on

The Other Hand

Sophia Dang

Ink and watercolor

Dust

Victoria Stevenson

I live in a world dusty and true
I never knew dust's meaning 'till now Millions of particles
A reminder of what we've done

The only way to see a beam Is through one's own Cells dirt fibers & dreams
A synopsis of where we've been reflected in winter light

Dust collects it all Every conversation
Every act of physical desperation Every lonely compartment of the mind

A memory of what once was Now refuse collected in corners Forgotten under the bed
In the seams of sweaters

Sheets into the wash Pillows beaten out Wipe down the bedside table Desk and dresser too

Soon you'll be gone Swept up and thrown away
No longer twinkling comfort In the sanguine silver rays

But do you ever really leave?
Can you ever be rubbed away?

No, the record can't be purged
Not just you and me—our predecessors too
All of us submerged in our collective past Intermingling atoms

Amassed, on fan's blades Between floor boards
A succession
Of intimate transgressions

Conflagration
Anitha Ahmed

fez, morocco

in late may the garbage burns from the taxi home i watch the flames climb piles of waste on the dry hills black smoke twists by the road at dusk the jacaranda tree blossoms behind the villa i watch its weeping crown its sweet purple deepens in the red light dark petals land in my palm at night i lie awake with the windows ajar nectar in my nose and smoke in my throat

Newborn Exam
Jordyn Tumas

Soft and supple are the fontanels I trace
As a phrenologist or a soothsayer, Feeling fault line mountain ridges under translucent skin.
With gentle pressure the wisps of black hair yield Into perfect crests,
The fresh survivor all the while calm and still,
Exhausted from the victory,
The memory already fading Before it is even spun—Resurfacing from the tsunami glorious Expatriate, gasping first breath
The burn of Life washing through his jaws and bronchi, A heady cocktail bounding deep into the ravine While unknowing eyes search this new chasm for reason, Scan the horizon for answers,
And reconcile an existence without metric.

Sweet Shop - Tangail, Bangladesh
Micaela Langille Collins
Photograph

The Descent
Jeffrey Lee
Photograph

Snapple Facts
Madeleine Norris

Did you know that cashews are technically a fruit?

My brother is a hedgehog. He believes the world is out to get him. He has since he was a child and the world saw him as out to get it. So now, he sits curled up, his sharp spikes protecting him from the outside.

Have you ever heard that there is a strawberry museum in Belgium?

On rare occasions, he softens the spikes. Alone, at home when we're bonding over books or Snapple facts. My soul will reach a willowy hand out and try to touch his, only to learn I have no idea how to recognize him, or how to trust a stranger.

Autism Spectrum Disorder is also called "Wrong Planet Syndrome."

Sometimes I wish I could be a hedgehog. I want to curl up and show just spikes to the world, so no one can see my face. Not unless they carefully hold me and allow my spikes to soften. Not unless they wait patiently, and allow me to roll over when I'm ready to show them my soft underside.

Did you know that scientists have no idea why Tylenol works?

Scientists don't know what causes Autism Spectrum Disorder. Leading research suggests "it's connected to early developmental changes in brain structure." I wonder when they'll clarify that.

Did you know that hedgehogs are not native to America?

They must feel like aliens.

Daydreams
Kevin Tang
Oil on canvas

Glitter
Rachel Werk

The sun struck it, Creating an effervescent glow
In the middle of the beach.
My feet took off
Dragging my legs, my arms, my head, my heart, my Heart, Along for the ride.
Leaping into that pile Analyzing every crystal.
Diving in and out
For ten months, Searching
For what I had seen from a distance.
But instead,
I found the harsh Truth of light;
And realized,
It was just sand.

The Twelve Apostles
Kevin Tang
Oil on canvas

Fog|January|Delaware River|North Philadelphia
Holly A. Rankin
Photograph

Plain
Anya Platt

And finally it becomes clear to me that I'm too afraid to write in plain words – shy to be seen, safer veiled. So, I write in hidden verse, so smeared with fog that I can't see through it when I look back. I write in gray weather because it sounds better, too.

Thirty thousand feet up, I circle my way around the inescapability of solid matter. I try, so futilely, to find a loophole – one where I can slip in and out (always so guided by whim and doubt), where dense fog marries thick moss, raises baby sprouts. Young child, have you not yet learned to just have your cake or eat it? My brain crunches on carrots and dip. The sky is beautifully sad, a stormy plain, vast highlights of this yellow light. It catches my eye as I sit here contemplating. In the midst of travel, turbulence trying so desperately to shake me awake way up in the sky, I tie weights to my belt, call them grounded.

This is my least favorite time of day. When light becomes night, I feel the sadness of the last sentence on the last page of a book, the wanting to slow down the inevitable. I fight a forward-pointing arrow; sunsets sink, eyes read to the end, and it is here that my mind wanders most heavily.

I dwell on the repetitive drip, raindrop currency (bartering smiles for sulk)

my head clouds, feelings condense with no words to put names to, precipitate out in this leaky rain leaky brain

home Anthony Vu

in little places we each called home where our flesh was once formed and minds were once molded yet ever so often, tempers fray like brushfire as our fathers seized the Crown Royal and our mothers sought the frontlines telling us to run like gazelles so we listened and we quickened meeting halfway between the fumes that billowed from our chimneys thousands of yards apart

when we meet eyes, we lay across the harvest with our damp backs unadulterated to naked soil and our bare toes titillated by rustling grain we stare upon the sky where there are no traces of anything grey except for the sparrows whose shadows tessellated our faces like we were two strangers in a masquerade without any care of the chaff between our hands nor the waning sunlight above our heads because we were together alone in a little place we now call home

Still Life
Samantha Nguyen
Pen on paper

I'm Sorry
Yashmi Mahat

"You'll be fine"
A bright cheery smile
I gave you
As propofol Burned
Through your veins

"We'll take good care of you"
I told you
Not knowing you
Not fully understanding
You. Your story.
It. The pathology

"I'm scared"
Your eyes told Right before the mask Shut them close.
Unacknowledged

Belly splayed Burning fat Blood

MY hands in guts
MY fingers wrapped Around pulsating aorta
The rush of adrenaline
The thrill of incision
The delicacy of a dance

Poked and prodded
In the cava
Our knife
Where we hadn't anticipated Opening spaces never seen Lost.

Lost
I forgot.

I forgot
You.

You

A boy of just 19
A lifetime dissected away
The consequences of our knife Lay before your life
The purest joy
The greatest privilege
I gained
In exchange
Your suffering.
Because we couldn't Because we did
And I had told you
"You'll be fine"

Elodie
Madeleine Norris
Dyed Canvas, digital manipulation

Gavel
Anya Platt

as a matter of fact, funny you should ask:

it was always a question of her motives in that singular moment;
swiftly, she lifts her eyes [perhaps then she did, too,] and now in the room with the gavel she,
in question,
she just stands and stands and then,

lips pursed, hands clasped she begins,
"Context matters."

Specimen for Frozen Section
Michelle Chen
Watercolor and ink

Untitled
Anya Platt

A. (Barter)

Because I can't give words
I give little kisses, dry Smiles, small, so as only to be slightly disingenuous
I give birth to games played only because it was all too smooth With too much happiness that was never meant all for me (too much, all the niceties)

B. (Spool)

Love, timid tapping, tattoo on chestwall: I spin it in my hand, spin it top-like spinning so it doesn't fall, just keeps spinning; spin it weave-like into spools of thread, sew it into all my jean patches and buttons and knit sweaters, keep pieces of it on my body, easy, running stitch running after me; spin it into stories, tales of missing and longing and wanting and my full name spoken by full lips and my simple presence simply missed.

Opposite page:
City Hall
My Duyen Nguyen
Photograph

Birthing Hands
Samantha Schoer

ripped vaginas skin cut with scissors like children's play without time for straight edges my hands like slender wonder inside

red blood on my cold cracked hands almost like a hot bath i could stay here lifting her body out from inside you slippery wet and heavy with a heave onto your lap this time i don't worry i will drop her my hands have memory

these hands that tie knots like interweaving patterns keeping a bond between women with each loop
i will remember the motions of how you came into this world and i found your little heart cupped inside my palm

Opposite page:
Metal Fiend
Tariro Mupaso
Mixed media

Ground Glass
Samantha Schoer

Alone in a room
The central air flicks the robe around her bare legs
Have you ever been as cold as when waiting for the doctor?

Between her legs, all the secrets and smells of life.
I ask her to relax her knees
As if she's slipping into bed
Like I won't harm or hurt or open up the parts of her sewn closed.

The ached position of my neck Never enough light to see through her, all of her But she feels like glass
As if her bowels are displaying every churn As if I can see her swallow her secrets and watch them pass into my gloved hands.

I wash my skin raw at the sink.
The door shuts.
My fingers remain cold all day.

Tree
Katie Sommers
Pencil on paper

whistle Harnoor Kaur

whistles take countless forms, whether they stem from shrill pierces of sound with wiry blades of grass sticky in-between my tiny childhood thenar mounds, sweet soulful feathered chirps that my eyes could never move quickly enough to match, unwelcome horns made by prying fingers stuck in the mouths of men that make me pause in my first step and speed up in my second. whistles, so seemingly natural in their ubiquitous presence, human, animal, kind, chiding, commanding, always attention-seeking, head-turning,
a gesture of communication, flirtation, migration, or predation.
yet, at its very core, a whistle is the forcing of breath through the gap between your fingers, teeth, or lips, pilgrims narrowing to prevent air from escaping silence with shattering trills.

someone once told me that little girls shouldn't whistle.
you know damn well that I became a good whistler.

Zeke
Samantha Nguyen
Pen on paper

Women's Month
Samantha Schoer

each month she comes a red tidal wave and i am reminded of my sex despite baggy jeans and anger my breasts grew against my jerseys popping up overall buttons and my mother handed me a training bra

i like to think about my genes, two strong X's together, holding space science teaches me: one is coiled up, letting the other run the show community is not Barred but we bar the women who didn't grow up bleeding the ones who were happy to develop breasts from holding space with us my mess cannot be controlled i spend dollars on supplies scrubbing blood out of tiles, cotton, covers i am so damn tired of this life it takes a woman doctor to tell me i do not need to bleed it takes a movement to have my pills paid for by insurance it takes a revolution to allow me my own cells.

each month they come a wave of hatred and pus and i am reminded, i am not this this month is mine and nothing is.

Opposite page:
Study for a Graphic Novel
Naomi Newman
Oil on canvas

Lessons for My Daughter
Madeleine Norris

When I think about my daughter,
I think about teaching her to read;
that the word laughter and daughter are spelled the same, sound so different, yet both feel like silk leaving my mouth.

I think about holding her hand, showing her the firm grip to keep on her dreams, and the paradoxically soft touch with which she should hold the world.

I see her tiny hands chasing bubbles, with reckless hope in stretched palms that somehow, she'll be able to catch one, and keep it safe forever.

When I think about my daughter,
I see bubbles, hearts, and glitter, cars, superheroes,
and boots made for adventure.

But, I also think about the fear I had before my first kiss;
or that Friday when my stomach spilled over my jeans, and my shirt couldn't hide it.

When I think about my daughter,
I try not to see a dark bed, my body trapped beneath the firm grip of a boy, who told me I was skinny and pretty.

When I think about my daughter,
I think about the Me Too's.
And the men who only understand the hurt when it's their sisters, and mothers, and daughters.

And, sometimes I think about Japanese pottery.
They fix broken pieces with liquid gold.
So, something becomes more valuable once broken, its history now wrapped around it like a glistening web.

When I think about my daughter
I don't know what to tell her.
Do I warn her she'll be wrapped in gold?
Popped bubbles, broken hearts, and weighed down with gold.

Opposite page:
Folklore
Jarred Holt
Digital art

I am art
Sh'Rae Marshall

I am not sure
if this is love, but I am falling for a boy who calls me art.

With hands that teach me how it feels to crave death, he sculpts me.
As if these bones can be molded like clay instead of shattered like glass.
As if this skin can learn how to tell stories of an artist and his brush instead of a poet and her trauma.

I am not sure
if I forgive him, but at least he is sorry.
He tells me this after he paints a moon around my eye.

But,
he comes home
with chocolates.
And allows me to sink into him.
Like.
He can absorb my pain.
Like.
The arms that make me feel safe aren't attached to the hands that make me feel hollow.

I am not sure
if he is emotional, but I am sleeping with a boy that introduces me to his demons.

Lungs
Alex Siegelman
Digital art

And I don't know which one I'll be blessing tonight.
But, I will invite him to pray in my shrine.
To be baptized in my ocean.
To taste the flesh of his savior.

I am not sure
if he will change, but at least he is trying.

His yells begin to harmonize with the sound my body makes when it is thrown to the floor.

I believe this is performance art.

But,
I never agreed to have our home be a museum.

I am not sure
if he will realize, but I have fallen again.

I want to rise on my own.
I want to be the Jesus my mother raised me to be.

But instead,
I live on the floor.
Broken into so many damn pieces,

waiting for you to rebuild me with the lacquer and gold and silver that you promised.

I may not be in love,
but at least I am art.

Cherry Chiffon Cage
Daisy Zhang

I lost my breath when you pulled me off my feet
And our hips swung to the times
As we tried not to trip on dress trails

Red dress chiffon love hit me hard
As I helped you tie your tie While you tied my heartstrings into knots

When your heart bloomed daisy petals
And you said it was my fault
I could have cried into your hand cupping my chin

And many times later
We drowned ourselves in swinging skirts
And scarlet suits

Suiting up to impress who We didn't know or understand As cherry chills rode up my thighs

Lace string strung around mesh Caging in a corset cavity That smothered the petals beauty died for

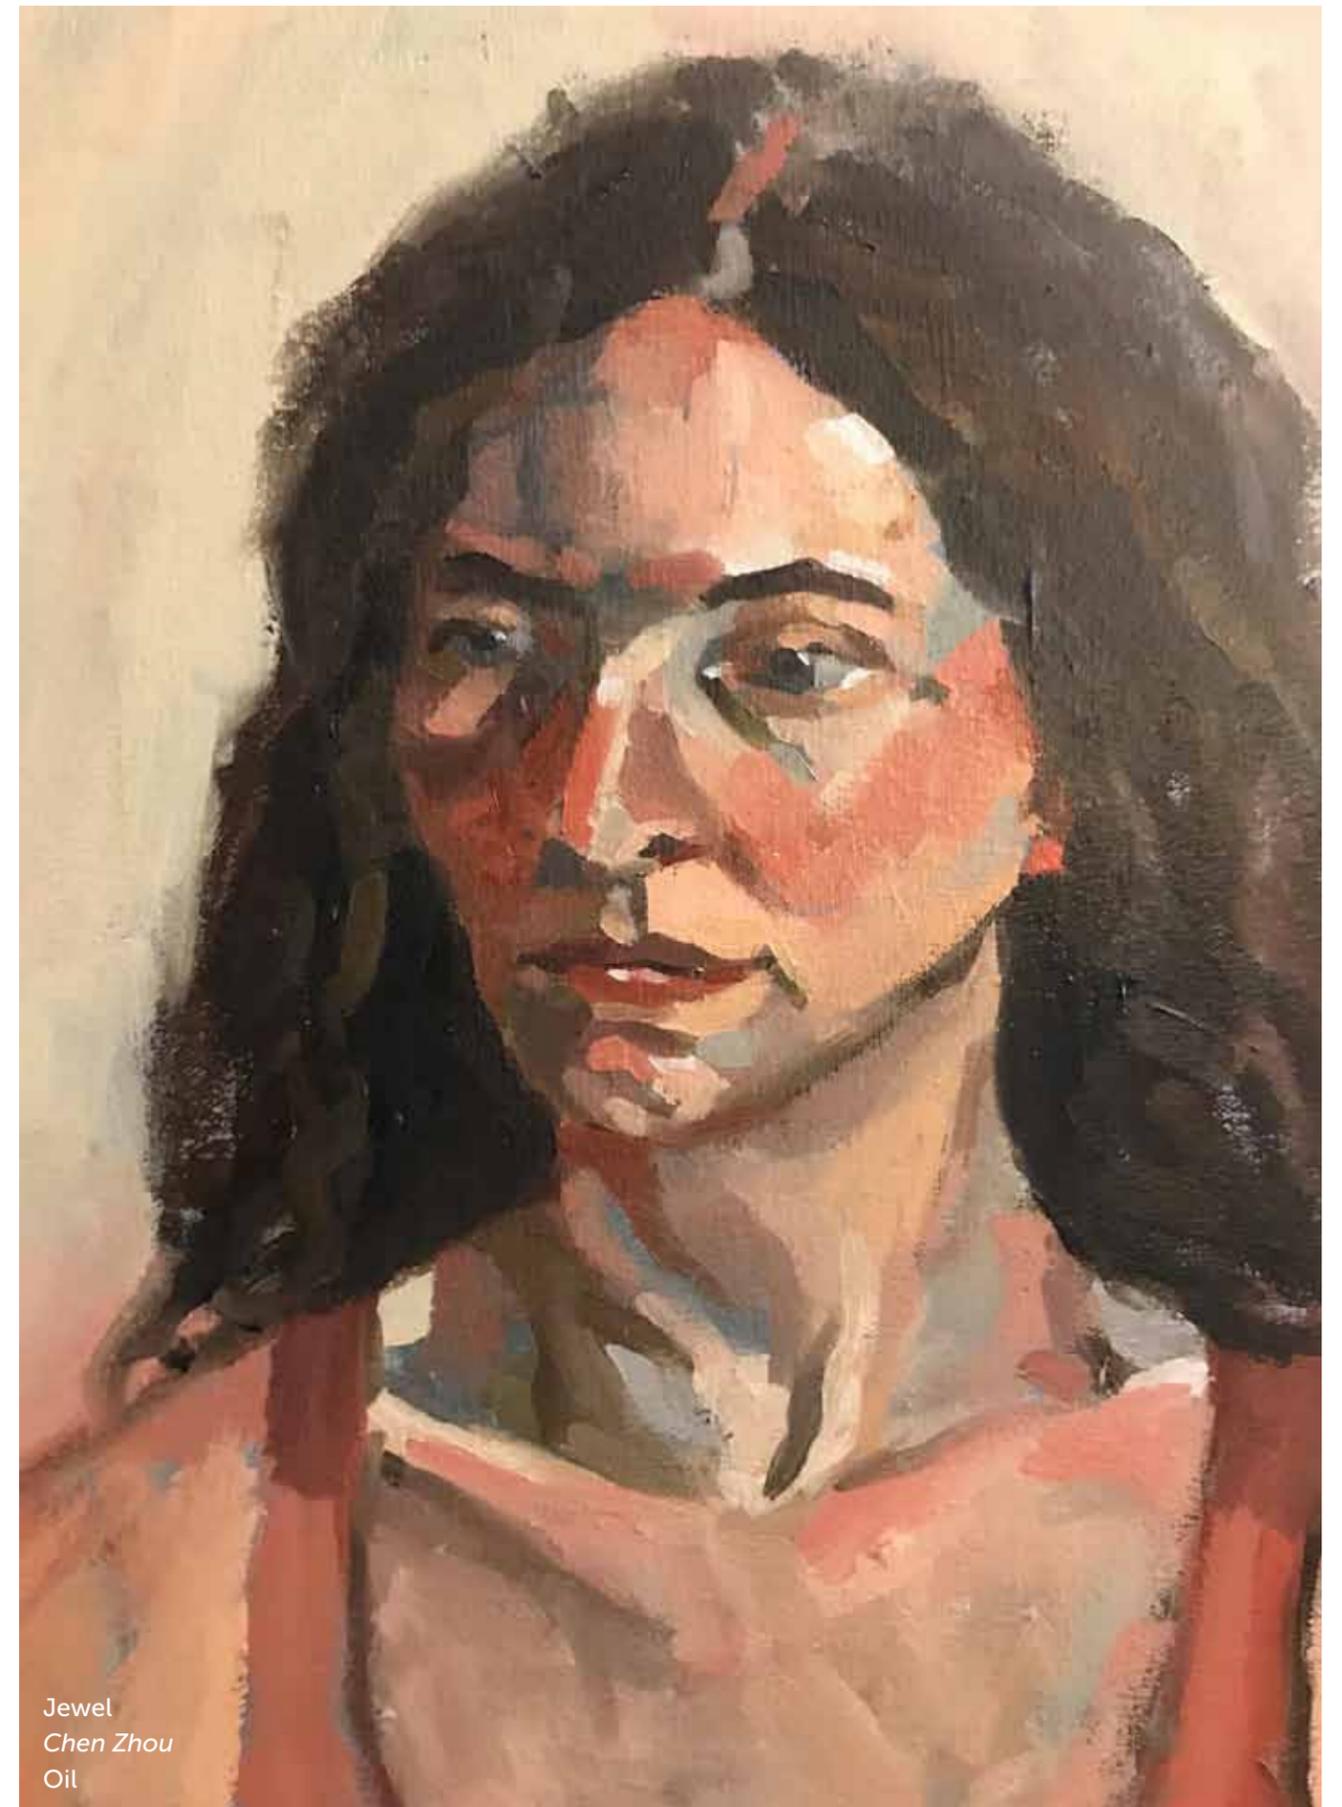

That time you caught my hand
And held my heart in a heavy fist And stared

I knew something was wrong
As your gray eyes grieved
And your mouth set a grim line

Worry had whipped up my will When I grabbed your hand and lead That night we spun pretending nobody was in our way

That night, you drove me home without music
I was left feeling the knots of my earphones
That I kept forgetting you didn't tie

That night, I laid awake in bed Blinking to passing headlights And bathing in moonlight slits, Knowing that this would be the last time.

Jewel
Chen Zhou
Oil

My mother is dramatic. The day I received my first college acceptance letter, she cried for a half hour on the phone. I pictured her sobbing, apologizing with a wave of Kleenex tissues, and patting under her puffy eyes to prevent the mascara from running. She invited four of her coworkers to personally congratulate me over the phone. The last one was some creep who instructed me to pack plenty of condoms. I gave him an obligatory giggle and then my mom quickly shooed him away.

My father's reaction was a bit more contained. I wasn't sure what to expect precisely, but I knew that it would be aloof. This was just the type of man he became.

"Good job, kiddo" he said.

I stood there as he pretended to read beyond Congratulations. I wanted more from him. He glanced up and smiled at me from a La-Z-Boy chair he inhabited since he arrived. That damn chair. I always offered an applause whenever I saw him up at the refrigerator or answering the door. He probably thought that it was teenage sarcasm. But, that wasn't it. I was genuinely proud.

This last year had been tough for him. After he had his left leg amputated during a tour in Iraq, he was coerced to return and assimilate into an unfamiliar lifestyle. My mother called it his biggest fear: living with her for more than 6 consecutive months. When he did arrive, the warmth and laughter that had been dancing throughout our home hid away. It resurfaced in the kitchen, while my dad had been napping. Sometimes, on the porch, when my mother and I shared a cigarette. Yet, I felt sympathy for him. He went from a muscular man, who was lively and personable, to barely weighing 140 pounds and religiously watching reruns of shows in black and white.

For months, my mom and I tried to bring him happiness. My mom cooked his favorite meals, invited his buds over for dinner, and massaged his back almost daily. It became a routine after she worked a 10-hour shift, herself. He thanked her with a plea to stop treating him differently. Sometimes through yelling, other times through silence. Their love didn't always look like this. Before his accident, they were nauseating to be around. They made out in his Ford pickup truck and she laughed at his incredibly witless jokes. Whenever he came home from deployment, they stayed out late and jogged together most mornings. When he wasn't home, mom would wait up hours past her bedtime just to FaceTime with him. Their conversations usually consisted of recipes my mother wanted to try and summaries of football or baseball games eagerly presented by my dad. They always ended with "I miss you and I love you." However, after his accident, their conversations changed. She would ask about his day, he would get annoyed. She would apologize, he would ask her to stop apologizing and then he would redirect his attention back to the television. Every day, it was the same story.

I took a different approach. Pops and I used to obsess over college football. We lived near Clemson University, so naturally we bled orange and purple. Pops had a fraternity brother who was also a fan. Every season, this guy rented a luxury suite at the stadium. They served shrimp cocktail, a hundred types of cheeses, and sparkling wine my dad used to sneak into my hands. "Don't tell your mother" he would say, grinning and rubbing his knuckles on the top of my head. We went to so many games that he began greeting some of the security guards by their first names.

He was much more enthusiastic about the Clemson culture than I ever could be. But I attempted to match his excitement anyway. We screamed obscenities at the referees who couldn't hear us, jumped up and down when Clemson made a touchdown, and threw punches in the air when the opposing team scored. I knew football made him happy. So, for the sake of nostalgia, I bought him a Clemson mug and hat for his birthday.

I didn't bother to wrap it. Instead, I dropped the hat and mug in a birthday bag I recycled. We were all at the dining room table, even my dad. I gave him the bag right after my mother and I butchered a Happy Birthday harmony. He opened my mom's gifts first. He was going through the motions of unwrapping like it was an annoying duty. Slippers, expensive cologne, massage oil, and a smoke-wood candle. It was clear that he wasn't impressed. I knew that he would appreciate mine more. I knew him. When he pulled out the presents I bought, he softly said, "thanks, son" and smiled, without showing any teeth. He immediately asked for tea so that he could use his mug. I then noticed that he put the hat behind him, as if he was already discarding it.

Industry|January|Delaware River|North Philadelphia

Holly A. Rankin

Photograph

"Sorry, I figured your head may be too big" I joked. He clenched his jaw and managed to force out a few laughs, but none that were convincing, none that sounded like my dad's.

"I think he may be depressed or have PTSD" I said shyly to my mother. I was expecting her response to be an urgent demand for me to take those words back. Instead, she merely said, "He'll be okay." Her eyes stayed fixated on the country road ahead of us. She then turned up the car's radio to hum along to old Dolly songs I didn't know the lyrics to.

When we arrived at my graduation, we were greeted by my neighbor's family in the parking lot. They looked like one of those families in a stock photo, framed on a shelf inside of a Target. Miss Salutatorian Stacy and her younger sister were wearing matching floral sundresses. The very flirtatious mother was wearing a white sundress with a hat straight from the Kentucky derby. And of course, her pearls. Dr. Green, Stacy's super-old dad, was a bit more casual. He must have thought that tucking his Brooks Brothers polo shirt into his straight fitted jeans made him look younger. Surely, people considered them a lovely family. I, however, found them to be repulsive. The monogrammed accessories, the overzealous South Carolina pride, the 'Thank You' cards. I didn't buy into any of it. Yet, they easily beguiled their way into my dad's fondness. Before his accident, my dad made my mother jealous by relentlessly praising Mrs. Green's sweet potato pies. "Stacy's mom has got it going on" he joked, knowing that my mother loathed her.

"How's Joe, darling?" Stacy's mom asked. She was looking at me but directed this question to my mother.

"He's doing just fine," my mother replied.

Later that day, at the barbeque my mom organized for my graduation, things got worse. Pops and my mom got into a little argument. I was going to walk into the house to grab a bag of chips. When I opened the back door though, I heard my father yelling. "I never agreed to this shit!" At that moment, I wasn't sure if he was referring to the party or his disability.

"I'm exhausted and just don't feel like entertaining people. You should have had this somewhere else!"

I saw my mother from where I was standing. She was wearing those stupid pleated khaki shorts and a loose fitting "army wife" shirt. She stirred the potato salad and replied without even bothering to look up.

"Our son graduates. I'm at his ceremony at 8am after working until 1am the night before. I planned and cooked all of this by myself. But you are exhausted?" She paused and then repeated the question that any sane husband would know not to respond to. "Exhausted? Joe, all you do is sit around in that chair and sleep. You have a prosthetic. Get up. Use it." I was standing at the door separating a house of 2 bickering adults and a backyard of hungry teenagers.

"Fuck you" he said. Not loudly, but loud enough to drown any voice my mom had before those words fired from his mouth like bullets. "Fuck you. I don't need some fake leg and I don't need this shit. Especially from you!"

She stopped stirring the potato salad and stared down into the bowl as if she was watching a funeral. She fought back tears that she deserved to let flood this place which no longer felt like our home. After another minute or so, she looked up and quickly glanced in my direction. I scurried outside when she noticed me. She emerged a few seconds later holding a huge bowl of potato salad. Anger that evolved into sadness was painted all over her face. I wanted to hug her but I didn't. I grabbed the bowl, thanked her, and watched as she rushed back into the house to make sweet tea.

The weeks leading up to the beginning of college were slow. My mother began to spend more time at work and less time around my dad. My father still lived in his chair. I still tried to rekindle that father-son relationship we had. Admittedly, I missed how offensive he used to be. His misogyny and profound disgust for liberals always kept me entertained. That all stopped though.

When the day arrived to move onto campus, my mother woke me up with tears already leaving trails down her cheeks. She had rented a U-Haul truck we packed the night before. Foolishly, I gave her consent to go shopping for my dorm room. She came back with countless bags of cleaning supplies, soap, underwear, socks, and toothpaste. She also successfully bought bed sheets and a comforter that were even more embarrassing than I thought was possible. She designed my room in a pre-pubertyesque fashion but I knew not to complain.

My dad told me that he was not going to join us for the trip and would instead see me for Thanksgiving. "I'll just be in the way" he said, as he flipped through channels on the television. He was still wearing his pajamas and seemed content with already being downstairs without showering first. I half-heartedly tried to change his mind but I knew my attempt would be futile. After about 5 minutes of trying to persuade him to come, I finally said, "whatever." I then opened the fridge to grab a few bottles of water for the trip.

He called me over and casually handed me his dog tags from the military. I always thought his dog tags were special. When I was younger, he bought me a pair with our last name etched on both sides. I didn't take them off for years. I wore them in the shower, when I slept, and even at church services. However, when I reached high school, I stopped wearing them. They just stopped being that important. But, these were his official dog tags from the army.

"Dad. What are you doing?" I asked.

"Just take them. I want you to have them," he replied. I knew that he would interpret my decline as disrespect, so I put them on. I let the chain drape around my neck with the two tags dipping into the middle of chest. I then kissed his forehead and told him that I loved him. He nudged me off and said that he loved me too.

"Call me when you and your mother gets there" he demanded.

"Will do, pops." I then closed the door behind me and joined my mom, who was already waiting for me in the U-Haul. She smiled, asked if I was ready, and started up the truck.

Two hours into our trip from South Carolina to Ole Miss, she turned down the music I was playing from my phone. I turned my head to face her and then she took a deep breath.

"What mom?" I asked, upset but simultaneously concerned. Tears began to roll down her face. I noticed them even though she was wearing oversized sunglasses.

"Your father and I are getting a divorce" she said. I didn't respond. Instead, I turned the music back up, rolled the window completely down, and stuck my hand out of it. I wanted to feel fresh air passing through my fingers. Her eyes stayed fixated on the country road ahead of us. Though I could feel her heart break with guilt and shame, I thought, at least she tried.

Alleyway
Samantha Nguyen
Pen on paper

Innocence
Daisy Zhang

You lay with your hand curled on his lap, facing an open sky.
The melody of birds chirping numbs your ears as the blue becomes pink And the pink, becoming of infinity.
Idle chatter halts at your lips as you watch twisted branches unfurl in the darkening sky
The summer air is hot and heavy and the arched wood, ancient and grand, dances in a light breeze
As silence descends upon two seedlings under an old oak,
You staring up into an infinite pool, him admiring the final drops of light glinting in your eyes,
You don't know how to tell him that you think trees are more beautiful than people,
And he doesn't know how to tell you that he thinks you are more beautiful than the world.

Broken
Sh'Rae Marshall

Broken.

Sometimes,
I dream about the past.

In these dreams,
my son is laying on my chest.
Our breaths are in sync and I am rubbing his back.

It is a Saturday morning.

My wife is there, too.
brewing hazelnut coffee
and burning an egg omelet.

Then it happens.

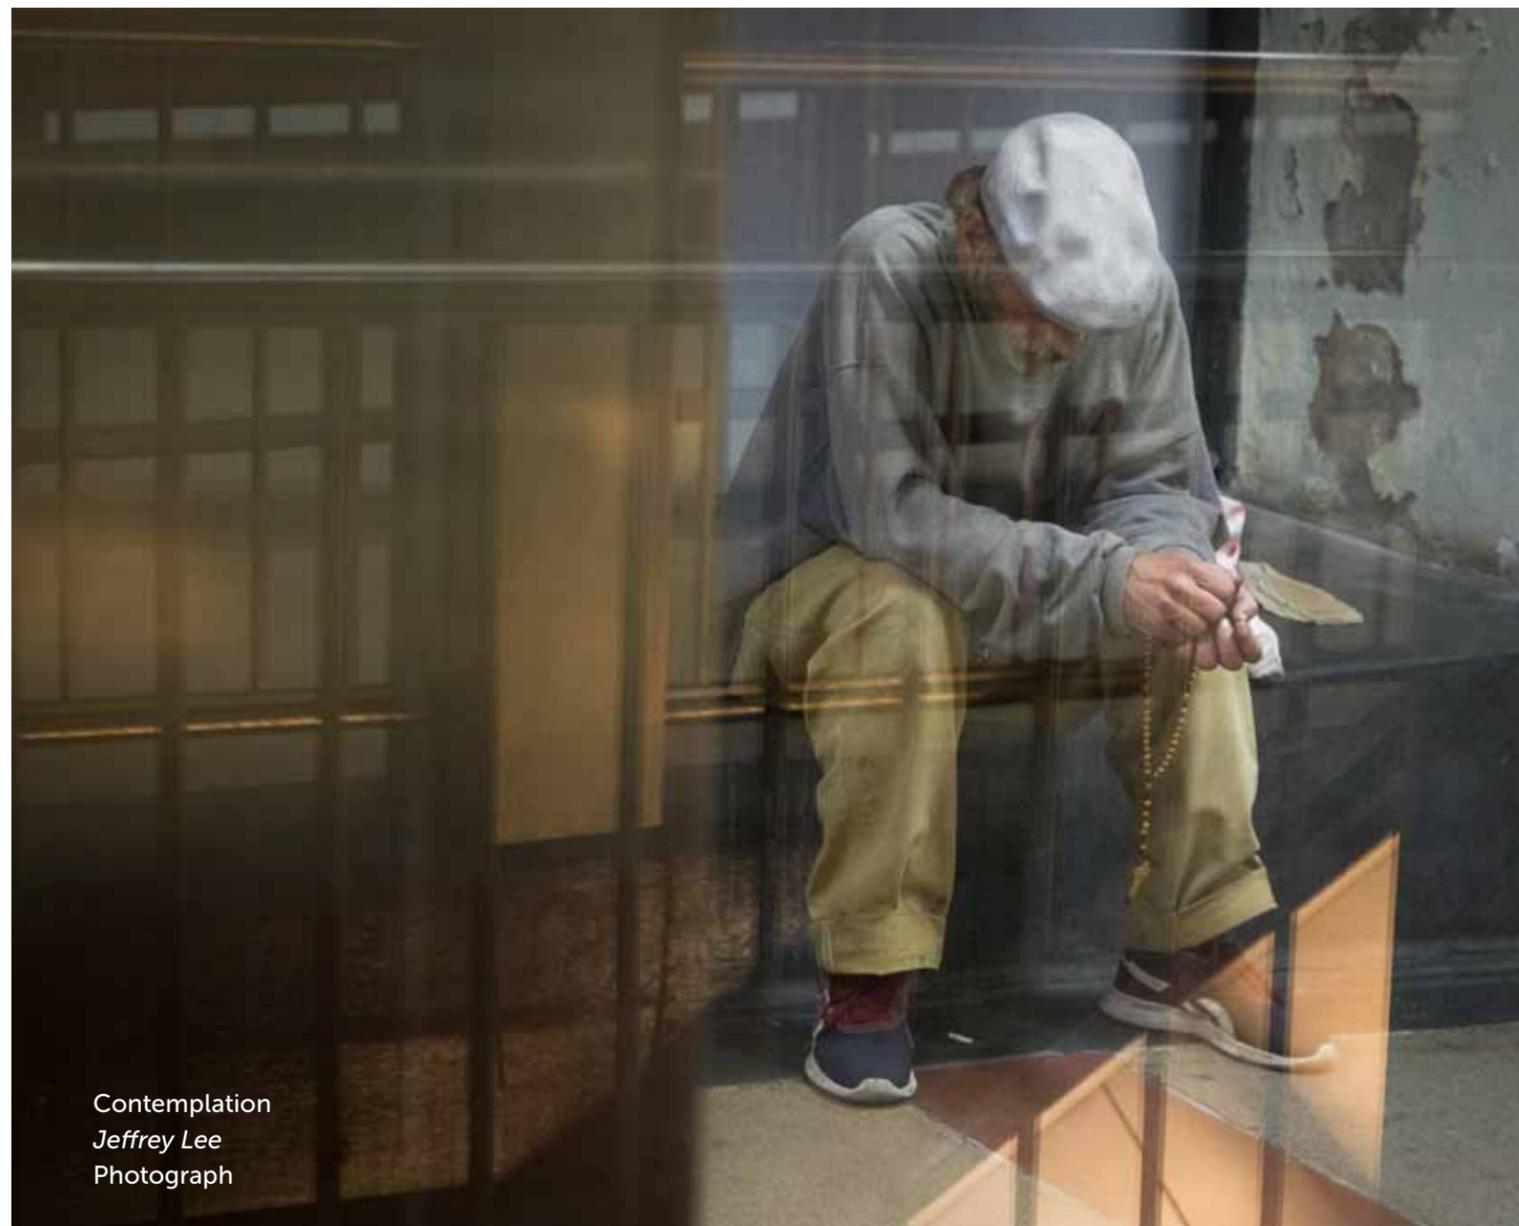

There is a car accident.
There is a hospital.
There is a funeral.

And then I awaken, with veins that starve for amnesia.

When I am with Heroin, my body forgets how to feel.
I mean,
my body refuses to acknowledge pain.

If they were here

My son, those eyes would break me.
In them,
I would swim.
And
drown in anger, drown in yearning.

Contemplation
Jeffrey Lee
Photograph

My wife, she would say
"Coño, you're pathetic."
But I wouldn't see what she would see.

There are no mirrors in my home.
Just a floor that is painted with blood and needles.
A mattress that hugs me when the drugs wear off And music that I dance to alone.
A bachata sway
and smooth footwork my father passed down.

I am okay. I am not empty.
I am not filled. But I am not empty.

I was called broken.
But
if I am broken, plant the pieces of me that are salvageable into the earth.

So that my soul becomes a seed for growth.
So that my burial becomes a ceremony for birth.

The remnants.
Burn and blow into the Harlem air.
I want to experience the life of a colorful mural.
I want to submit to the notes of a saxophone.

Once, I dreamt about quitting.
But how do I quit when this drug is the only love that I know?
How do I liberate myself from the only thing that allows me to feel free?
Who will I be after I give up all that I am?
Who is under this skin if I were to unzip it like a body suit?
How will I cope if I abandon what protects me?

I will never kiss my wife again.
I will never teach my son how to play baseball.
If I've lost the only people I've ever cared about,
Who will I be changing for?

Figure Study
Chen Zhou
Oil

My Adela
Shayan Waseh

He turned on the faucet and began to wash his hands. He heard the grandchildren's laughter fill the kitchen as they played in some corner of the house. He smiled. Home was good when it was full of family.

He turned to the granite countertop behind him, and took a moment to look at the assortment of knives as well as the meats and vegetables waiting to be cut. The ceiling light above gave the kitchen a warm atmosphere. He smiled at the memories of cooking at this countertop, recalling over forty-two years of meals. Then he was reminded of Adela, and his smile faltered for a moment.

But he pulled the cutting board stacked with boneless chicken thighs towards him. He picked the cleaver up, balancing its weighted handle in his palm, and he began to cut. Oh Adela, he thought.

She was never thin like girls in the magazines. She loved cuisine too much to be slender, but she was never big either. She would eat a whole rack of ribs on Sunday, but then only have a bite of dessert. He would jokingly call her Goldilocks. My just-right in-between, he would affectionately say.

As he finished cutting the chicken thighs into chunks, he remembered one evening about six months ago. He was standing in that same kitchen, making a seafood paella for Adela. It was her favorite dish. She leaned with her back against the sink and with her arms wrapped around her waist. She was very skinny and pale, and the smell of the shrimp and scallops wafted towards her and made her queasy. He remembered having to wash his hands and help her as she vomited in the bathroom.

It'll be okay Adela, it'll be okay, he had said as he rubbed her back. She believed him in that moment; there was no other choice. He reflected on that memory. It was surreal to think of Adela as the skinny woman she was those last few months of her life. It had gotten worse as the chemotherapy regime had progressed and gotten more desperate. Even the smell of chicken cooking on the grill would make her retch endlessly. She had made him promise, always keep cooking, even when I'm gone. There were no more assurances that she would be okay in those last few weeks.

He threw the chunks of chicken thigh that he had cut into the skillet and listened to them crackle as they cooked.

A Question of Death

Malika Madhava

"Wake up, we're going to Virginia." My 10-year-old brain jolted with sudden alertness; there was an unusual urgency in my mom's voice. I wondered why we were making the five-hour drive from New York to visit family on a lazy Saturday morning. Direct as ever, my mom explained, "Your grandfather is dying."

Not fully comprehending the reality of those three words, concern dissolved into excitement as I realized I would get to play with my cousins, who lived with my grandfather. I was unable to understand that this would be the last time I saw him. As soon as we reached my uncle's house, the midday sun high overhead, we raced up the steps to my grandfather's bedroom. He was lying peacefully on the bed in the corner with my family all closely surrounding him, vigilant. I snaked past them and pressed myself against my grandfather, whose breath was just barely perceptible. His fingers brushed softly against my hand as I slipped my small palm in his. My aunt whispered, "He was waiting for you guys to get here." Waiting for what? I didn't ask. I just watched the fragile rise and fall of his chest. It slowed painstakingly until finally, it stopped.

I didn't understand the concept of death at the time. Maybe if I did, I might have questioned how he 'held on' until we arrived. Or I might have asked what about the body allows us to be here in one moment and gone the next.

It wasn't until anatomy lab during the first few weeks of medical school that this question crystallized. After tracing the nerves that allowed my cadaver to taste, dissecting the arteries that breathed life into his muscles, and holding the heart that pumped oxygen throughout his body, I found myself wondering what was so different about those organs that they were no longer able to function. The large white plaques on his inconceivably large liver were evidence of the cancer in his body, but not of how it caused his soul to dissipate. There is little difference in the atomic composition of a living body and a dead one. The carbon and nitrogen building blocks are still there even if their ability to compose life ceases to exist.

As a first year medical student, I often turn to science to try to answer questions with a biological basis. I know that, scientifically, death is ultimately caused by a lack of oxygen to the brain, no matter what is penned on the death certificate. The moment of death is when the brain ceases to function, characterized definitively by the body's inability to breathe when removed from ventilation. In my search for an answer, though, I quickly realized that this definition fails to take into account the intricacies related to the moment of death.

In our era of life support and ventilators, cells in a brain-dead body could exist indefinitely. Even if the brain dies, the organs continue to be viable as long as the blood is receiving oxygen. It is only the brain that is dead: our medical concept of life is the ability to be aware of it. This distinction between life and death can appear rather obscure at times. Someone who fits the medical definition of 'dead' often exhibits the Lazarus sign, named for the saint that Jesus resurrected. The Lazarus sign involves a deceased person jerking upright and reaching their arms outwards before settling down and crossing their arms over their chest shortly after a ventilation tube is removed. This simple reflex arc, like a knee jerk, doesn't involve the brain. But a biologically-defined non-living organism would not be able to move on its own.

This ambiguity came to the forefront in the 2013 case of Jahi McMath, a 13-year-old girl who was declared brain dead after a routine tonsillectomy. Her family refused to accept brain death as a diagnosis of total death, and filed a lawsuit against Children's Hospital Oakland where she was being kept on life support. The court ruled that she fit the criteria of death, at which point the family moved her to a facility in New Jersey, where objections to the declaration of death on the basis of personal beliefs are allowed. She remains on life support and a feeding tube in a state of limbo to this day.

To those who follow the bible, she has a beating heart, and is therefore still alive. To a biologist, only parts of her are alive. To a doctor, she is undeniably dead. Who are we to say which is right?

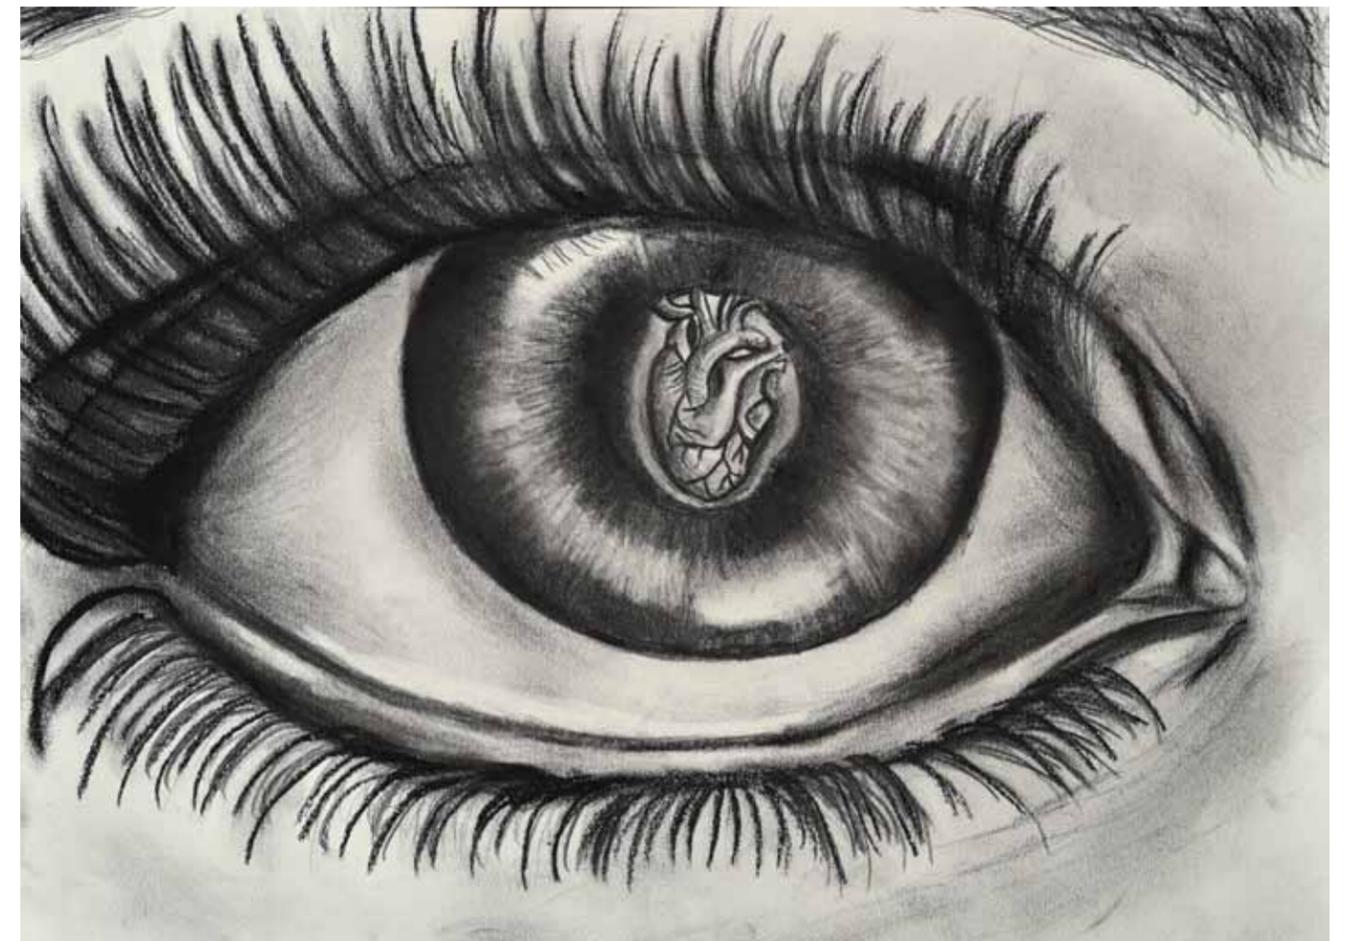

I may never have an answer to this question. Even now, knowing more about death than my ten-year-old self doesn't help me understand what caused my grandfather to die. I still don't understand if or how a person could stave off death, somehow controlling the moment that his or her organs cease to function. What makes the living state of molecules of carbon, nitrogen, and oxygen so fragile? Why is medical death not the same as biological death? All of these are questions that I may never be able to answer.

One day, as a practicing physician, I may see a 10-year-old watch her grandfather die. I may be the person to tell her family that their beloved has passed. And I may have to say that with a confidence that I might never have.

Eye Contact

Rachel Werk

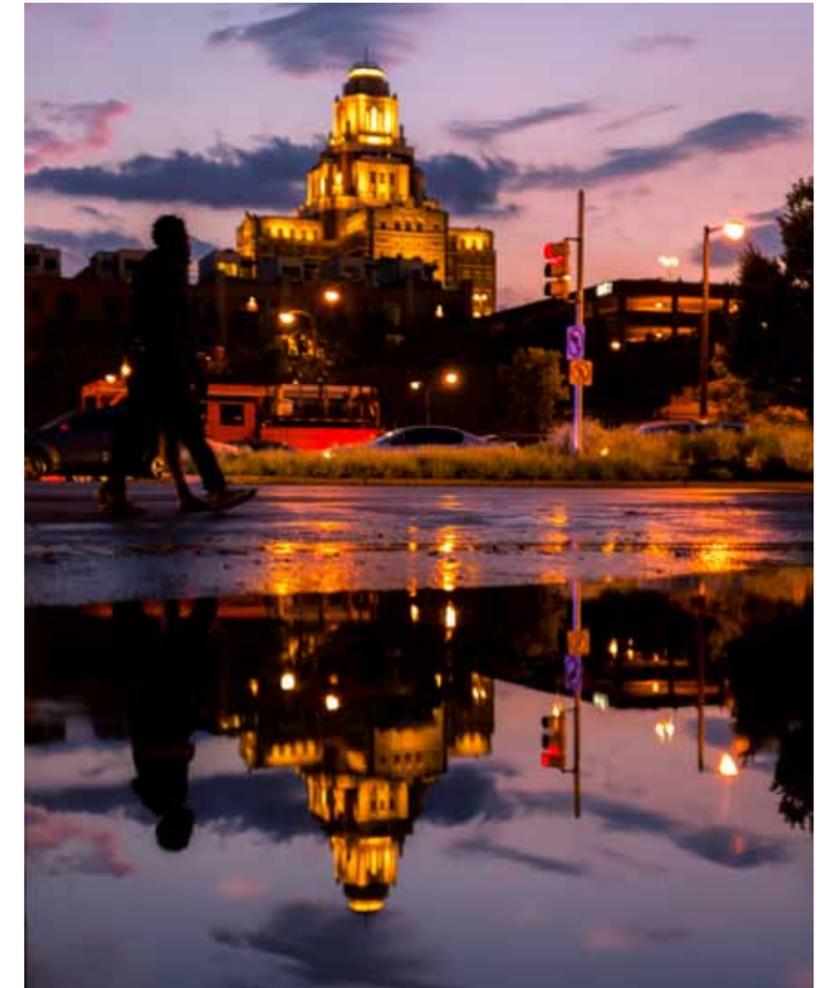

Pencil and charcoal

Food Water Shelter
Zachary Howell

whats that noise oh get up just sit up whats today go to the bathroom brush teeth shower put on clothes be a human get food need food is there food no no food need to get some but where run get it in ten minutes so tired get coffee need coffee need my brain get to class deep breath pay attention wow youre understanding paying attention youre doing well so well wait what was that catch up no too late now keep up dont think just know keep eyes open focus that body not yours the words theyre sleepy slow CLICK new topic new words theyre filling but always need more more more times up hungry busy sleepy meet the patient talk listen react care give more more more study cave live there feed the brain starve the body keep going keep learning cant waste the day got an email quick respond back to work need to eat go shopping carry it back put it away cook fast eat fast moms calling no time pack up back to the cave knowing is surviving need a break need water find the fountain drink it need more more more back to the cave back to safety survival is work work is survival keep reading need more more more im done leave the cave its dangerous but have to leave must leave get back floss brush bed.

The Last Kiss
Jeffrey Lee
Photograph

sunsets from antelope island Karishma Kodia

lilac and lavender purple vale rose whirled sky with a peach worship beneath the sun clouds in perfect formation cool undertones, patches of shade and pale ice blue upon a summer's night

this sky this view this peace.

mountains scraped, jagged with love from Mother Earth deep sky grays and upon this view a shimmering lake sparkling, dancing with light under Sun's glory with gentle, soft upon the night jades of erect leaves Sun and virtuous, pure Moon – ever together, ever apart shades of straw upon pink / gray / white rock permanent upon Man's transience rays of strength emanating among the valley the clouds a crescent and a crow sun slipping sliding, a rest for the night.

A Night at Penn's Landing Xiang Zhang
Photograph

The Spade
Mak Sarich

Far beneath the plain Drudges dig deeper.

Wherever the ground is soft,
they are pioneers.

Faster and harder.

Until their knuckles bleed, and their brain sweats

Saving earth for scrutiny Never for lament.

Queen's View, Scotland
Katie Sommers
Oil on canvas

Portrait Study
Chen Zhou
Oil

The Scars I'm Too Afraid To Get
B. Samuel Meyers

I can't breathe.

At least, not well. Through my nose. Crooked, long, identifiable. But the rest is fine and I sleep on my side with my mouth open and sometimes I snore on my back, but it's fine.

Or. I'll wear a nasal strip. To sleep. Not all day. We only use one nostril at a time anyway, so half the time I'm normal.

I'm missing two teeth.

Adult choppers. Born without 'em. Bottom jaw, premolar, hidden. But I still have the baby teeth in their stead and they only jiggle in their planters when I crunch a carrot or yank a bagel. Just a bit. They don't hurt. They'll last a while longer, I think.

I'm not seeing anyone.

Not right now. My preference. What would she think, what would they? But there are faces who've caught my eye, and they may have caught mine too, so we'll see. I tried to invite them to stuff. One looks the way a fleece blanket feels on your face on a cold Sunday. Run it over each cheek. Not in a creepy way. If I could then I'd be over it, it's just a blanket.

There's a surgery should get, another I'll have to get soon, and a woman I should ask to coffee. In fact, I'll ask her. With another friend. Just in case.

Vegas Remembered
Bryce Eng

I lay by the phone expecting you to call, expecting you to tell me you had not been there at all

Then I lay by the door
expecting you to come, expecting you to make all my fears look dumb

Now I lay in your bed hoping you will find rest, hoping one day I may lay down on your sweet breast

Best Friends
Jeffrey Lee
Photograph

Abstract Anatomy Introspection
Jordyn Tumas
Acrylic and modeling clay on canvas

i'm sorry
Harnoor Kaur

They were empty, scared, lost. They took their fears out on him, in their slurs, stones, and screams. He reached for his revolver, knowing well that bullet holes couldn't fill their souls, but that was too much to ask for anyway. He tried to buy time. He sat on the second floor with the window open, and pulled the trigger at the space in-between them. 1 shot. 1 foot back. 10 seconds. 10 inches forward. Their wave undulated until his trigger no longer held its power. They surged forward, crashing on the house. He yelled for his kids and wife to run, and stood, waiting for the sea to strike him. His family stood chipped, far away from the fight, but he lay at the epicenter of it all, smashed in a million pieces.

They fled the danger zone, searching for disaster relief. He was one of many. They were a few of thousands. Victims by confusion, refugees by ignorance, lost in turmoil. Displaced from their homes, their hopes, and dreams.

I'm sorry you couldn't be there to support them. Support your wife, freshly widowed and diagnosed with bipolar disorder, stuck living with half of her dead. Support your oldest daughter, with her keen mind and saddened eyes, who learned to fly to search for you in the skies. Support your middle son, whose intelligence took him far overseas, but too far without your guidance, as his vices painted his path. Support your youngest daughter, crying over books as she thirsted for knowledge, the only thing no one could take away from her.

With time, their chips repaired, their bruises faded, their hopes reappeared. I have reincarnated your youngest daughter's dreams, but even I have bullet holes I cannot fill. I'm sorry we could never meet.

When we walked in the room, the body was already open. If we hadn't gotten lost in the poorly lit hallways on the 3rd floor, maybe we could have seen it from the very start. Either way, there were 4 of us there, or 5 I suppose. A small older woman was holding the scalpel, a young woman stood not-so-nervously in the corner, and my 3rd year student who looked to me, the newly minted 4th year, for what to do next. I showed her how to don the surgical gown and gloves, though I'd only done this before for surgery on live patients. I thought how we weren't using the normal sterile technique, but I reasoned it mustn't matter too much now.

With soft jazz playing in the background and a wooden word spelling "Respect" resting on the window sill, we approached the cold metal table. Dr. Peterson explained why there was water running in channels under the slats of the table, though we could clearly see the red stained river it was washing away.

The breast bone was cut away with silver shears, like removing the crest from a suit of armor, revealing the most vital of organs. Her heart and lungs laid there in stillness, looking somewhat redder than I had remembered from my days in the anatomy lab. Wasting no time, Dr. Peterson began to pull the organs away from their resting place. Swiftly and precisely cutting the roots and connections between the body and its pieces. "Ah, see these adhesions, must've been a bad infection there," Dr. Peterson remarked. I supposed we found our answer, pneumonia. She had gone so quickly, we didn't have time for our usual workup. At 95, it wasn't unreasonable to succumb to an infection like that, but I guess the family needed closure. I wondered if I needed it too. We'd always been able to help them before, or at least try.

What came next felt more like Mortal Kombat finisher move than a routine medical procedure, one that inevitably happens in hospitals around the world - and funeral homes as I learned from Trina the young woman in the corner who is opening her own next year. Dr. Peterson grabbed the arch of the aorta and pulled, bringing all the organs along with it, like the deep roots of a weed revealing the connection and geometry hidden within.

Now safely transferred to their new metal bucket of a home, the organs were brought over to the bench for closer examination. She removed each organ in turn, remarking how she thinks her heart is probably the same size because she too is a little old lady, and that probably all our lungs are this blackened from living in this soot filled city. The endless commentary swung wildly from historical trivia to filmmaking analysis to the JFK assassination - or conspiracy as she proclaimed. All the while, she was carving out small rectangular sections of each organ and placing them in small rectangular cages to be made into microscope slides. "We don't really need these, I mean we know what took her, but I go through the motions. The body never ceases to surprise you." The lungs were filled with fluid from her pneumonia, the liver was congested with blood from her heart failure, the kidneys were scarred from years of hypertension, and the spleen had shrunken by age.

I wasn't sure I was surprised. Not about the pathologies, at least. I thought wouldn't it be more weird if she didn't have distortions at her age? It odd was to think that way, so morbid, so grim. It made me think of how much I had seen in my one year of work in a hospital, how much heart failure, kidney disease, how much illness. How much I still had to learn.

I felt the glance of my 3rd year student. I wondered what it must feel like for her to see such a procedure so early in her years. I wondered if she knew I had never experienced this before either, that I was just as wide-eyed and slack-jawed—thankful for the surgical mask hiding the view.

As we reached the heart, the final organ of this investigation, Dr. Peterson used her scissors to cut down to the coronary artery for sampling. She explained that the calcium deposits from atherosclerosis in those small vessels would be too much for the scalpel's blade.

"But hey, for a woman her age and all the years she kept her little heart going, I think she's entitled to that."

Her Grief Changes
Lily Black

Her grief changes. The changes are slow like the earth's movements. Only visible once they are complete. I do not see her underlying shifts and waves of emotions as she walks through the world with the edges of her mouth in the shape of a grin. I see her eyes twitch, but only sometimes, as if they are uncertain of which way to go – up or down, open or closed.

Sometimes, she raises her head out of the pool of tears and can see the faces in front of her. She breathes and sees the world surrounding her shapeshifting figure. Other times, she walks among the crowd, just like everyone else. She wears the black robing of the city dwellers, stepping in puddles with new boots as all others do. She can't see what's ahead but roams the ocean of mourning without a compass, untethered to time, direction, place. Place. Home. Where is that? What is that? Who is home to me now?

She has found home in the company of others. She finds it in those who love her, others who share her loss, and even people who have some unexplainable connection to her story. This connection seems rooted in the sorrow of preceding generations. Generations. "What does it mean to be a unique, never lived before human being," she wonders, "yet so profoundly made up of one's ancestors, grandparents, parents." She thinks this as she sees his eyes looking back at her in the mirror. Her father's eyes. They twinkle like his but resemble a more turquoise version of his deep ocean blue. Sometimes she even notices his off-centered smile come through to her in unexpected photos taken by another. How did she not notice these similarities until now? Now that he's gone.

Away. Gone. Lost. Somewhere out there she feels him around. Other times she does not. Has he just lost his way? Is it possible that he is on his way home from some roundabout route he stumbled upon? She questions her sense of reality as she feels the pounding of her heart, a glimmer of hope. Suddenly, she shakes it off and keeps walking among the crowd, pushing away the urge to see his face among the familiar boxy statures of the men around her. She sees his Irish caps floating amidst the streets, but she can only hope. Hope is all that is left.

Winter Farmscape
Samantha Nguyen
Pen on paper

I returned to that bench
Bryce Eng

I returned to that bench
down by the river
its coarse wood softened by touch of rain, ivory foliage sprung from bed below and moss-covered cracks made it whole

That long bench
down by the river had space for two but I as one was left undone

Untitled
Kanika Ramchandani

The crackling sounds of oil frying batter
The faint sounds of simmering dal I observe my mother's focus as she prepares a meal, all burners on the stove occupied, her hands dance across the kitchen moving to a rhythm only they know These aromas have raised me for as long as I can remember, seeped into my hair, clothes, skin
I smell of elaichi, of jeera, laung, haldi
They leave a memory, the essence of home Where my mother's sabzi and her mother's dal are made of pure love And still, they bring me tears—of knowing I will never be able to recreate what they know
My hands, are their hands, but they have been watered away from their roots
They have not lived and grown in the red soil of the motherland —
They do not know the same stories

Untitled
Jane Jacob Charcoal

alternate names for curiosity Sh'Rae Marshall

inspired by 'alternate names for black boys' by Danez Smith

1. a deep breath as he whispers "every guy tries it once."
2. a 2 am google search on homosexuality.
3. using 3 fingers to dance inside of a home you never thought would be so inviting.
4. 4 unanswered text messages from a boy you've been ignoring for weeks.
5. staring for 5 seconds longer than any other guy in the locker room.
6. Having the 6th sleepover in 2 months
7. Calling a guy faggot 7 times before diving into him like the neighbor's pool you've been burning to swim in.
8. Keeping your eyes closed for 8 minutes as he uses his mouth and lips to sacrifice your concept of masculinity.
9. Posting on Craigslist "Bicurious. Can host after 9." 10. Using 10 fingers to build 2 fists when he calls you his boyfriend.

Gold Brain Slice
Leena Ramani
Paint on canvas

Red
Mak Sarich

Dark thoughts
Scorched down my arm into my grip
My fingers tightened

Below me
Your face made a turn towards mine
My hand loosened

Dark eyes Unaware that the meaning of innocence Was defined by this moment

A fragment of a thought
Malika Madhava

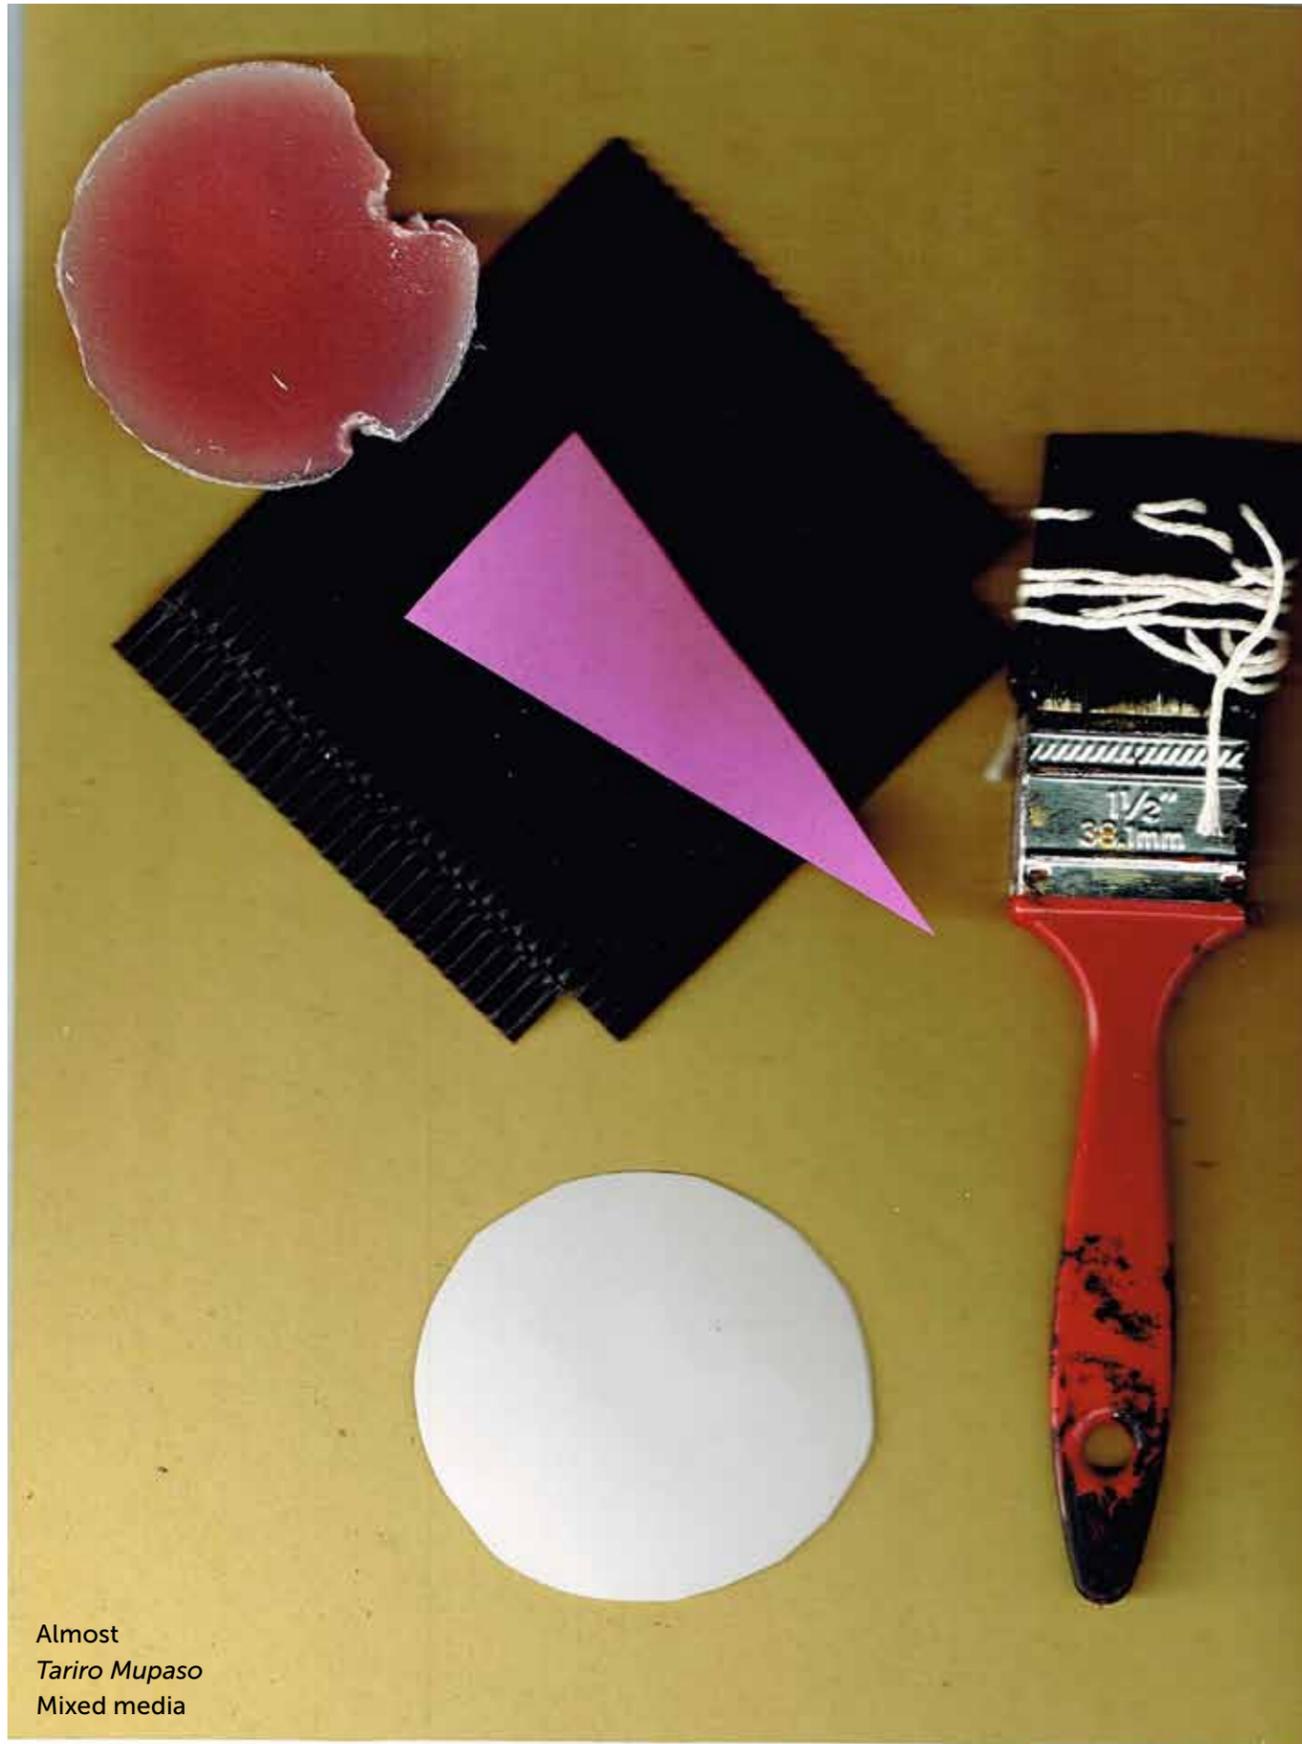

A simple word shatters:
a thousand lost connections, tightly twisted knots untangle.

The mumbled mice of the mind skitter scamper squeak—commotion drowning out sound notions.

Three six five, just letters:
the meaning as fallible as the mind That promised to hold on to it.

Cat Fight
Leena Ramani
Photograph

Almost Tariro Mupaso
 Mixed media

Contributors

Anitha Ahmed, Sidney Kimmel Medical College, 2020
 Katherine Cambareri, Jefferson College of Population Health, 2020
 Michelle Chen, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2019
 Micaela Langille Collins, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2019
 Sophia Dang, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2019
 Caroline Dunne, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2020
 Bryce Eng, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2021
 Jarred Holt, Jefferson College of Health Professions 2018
 Zachary Howell, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2021
 Jane Jacob, Jefferson College of Population Health 2018
 Harnoor Kaur, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2020
 Karishma Kodia, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2019
 Jeffrey Lee, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2020
 Malika Madhava, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2020
 Yashmi Mahat, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2019
 Sh'Rae Marshall, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2020
 B. Samuel Meyers, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2021
 Tariro Mupaso, Jefferson College of Health Professions 2021
 Naomi Newman, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2019
 My Duyen Nguyen, Jefferson College of Nursing 2019
 Samantha Nguyen, Jefferson College of Health Professions 2018
 Madeleine Norris, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2021
 Anya Platt, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2020
 Leena Ramani, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2020
 Kanika Ramchandani, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2020
 Holly A. Rankin, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2019
 Mak Sarich, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2019
 Samantha Schoer, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2019
 Alex Siegelman, Jefferson College of Biomedical Sciences 2018 Laura Simpler, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2018
 Katie Sommers, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2020
 Victoria Stevenson, Jefferson College of Health Professions 2018
 Kevin Tang, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2021
 Jordyn Tumas, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2019
 Anthony Vu, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2020
 Shayan Waseh, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2021
 Rachel Werk, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2019
 Daisy Zhang, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2019
 Xiang Zhang, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2018
 Chen Zhou, Sidney Kimmel Medical College 2018

Acknowledgments

Inside Out appreciates the kind support of the following:

Dorissa Bolinski: Inside Out Advisor, Publications Editor, Academic Affairs, Sidney Kimmel Medical College at Thomas Jefferson University

David Keenan: Senior Director, Office of Student Life and Engagement, Thomas Jefferson University

Charles A. Pohl, MD: Associate Provost for Student Affairs, Thomas Jefferson University
Senior Associate Dean for Student Affairs, Sidney Kimmel Medical College at Thomas Jefferson University

Mark L. Tykocinski, MD: Provost and Executive Vice President for Academic Affairs, Thomas Jefferson University
The Anthony F. and Gertrude M. DePalma Dean, Sidney Kimmel Medical College at Thomas Jefferson University

Megan Voeller: Director of Humanities, Office of Student Life & Engagement, Thomas Jefferson University